My yoga teacher says doing one pose a day is more beneficial than coming to class just once a week. What happens is that the one pose might lead to the next. In the arts, there can be a similar outcome with the practice of daily creating. Even if you do not feel like it, just start, just create 'anything,' and it might lead to the next something. And if not, at least you tried; that is what counts. Let's say that you have committed to set aside some time each day—or maybe every other day or just once a week—to create something. Or even once a month if that is all you can do. However, momentum is what we are after here, and working on something only once a month takes a lot of extra effort to gain that momentum between those monthly dates.

Counselling is about working with people, learning with people, so that at first sight it might seem like a very interactive job. However, those who have spent some time in the profession will recognize various experiences which contradict this belief. Counselling is interactive, yet in a very specific way which is different from the usual rules of personal encounters. It does have a certain status, it does initially induce appreciation from successful clients, and it can result in a certain feeling of self-esteem when we appreciate ourselves. However, such rewards may not be continuous nor great enough to prevent some 'bad days,' and the more surprising experiences of isolation which can occur.

The adoption of agriculture was the most fundamental change in human history. Not only did it produce settled societies for the first time, it also radically ① changed society itself. Gathering and hunting groups had few possessions and were largely equal. Land and its resources were not ② owned—they were available for whoever took them and food was shared within the group. The move to growing crops in fields and raising animals opened the way to seeing land, resources and food as ③ 'property.' The far greater amount of time and effort required by farming ④ weakened this trend. Perhaps at first land and food was owned by the community, but rapidly individuals did so, and access to land and food became ⑤ unequal.

Sweetness is literally a matter of taste. Although individuals vary greatly in the way they perceive a taste, it is possible to make some quantitative comparisons of sweetness. _____ (A) _____, we can take some standard sugar solution (say 10% sucrose in water) and compare its sweetness with that of solutions containing other sugars, such as D-Fructose, D-Glucose, lactose, or galactose. If a 1% solution of some compound tastes as sweet as the 10% sucrose solution, we can say that the compound is 10 times sweeter than sucrose. D-Fructose is the sweetest of the simple sugars — almost twice as sweet as sucrose. D-Glucose is almost as sweet as sucrose. _____ (B) _____, sugars like lactose and galactose have less than 1% of the sweetness of sucrose.

People have told a number of stories over the centuries, and there are a countless number yet to come. Great stories are about people. Sometimes the people look like bugs (Antz), wild animals (The Lion King), or even old cartoons (Who Framed Roger Rabbit?), but behind their appearances the characters are always people. The main character in the children's book The Missing Piece is a simple line drawing of a circle with a dot for an eye and a missing triangle space for a mouth, but that circle is still recognizably a person 'inside.' Science-fiction and monster stories like Alien or Jurassic Park are usually more about the people who must deal with the unusual and dangerous creatures than about the creatures themselves.

Spam amounts to around 90 percent of worldwide email traffic. That is because it is virtually free to send. In 2008 researchers estimated that spammers' costs for domain registrations, hosting fees, email lists, and so forth amounted to next to nothing: $80 per million messages. So spammers send tons, and receivers pay the price. A study at a German university concluded that each one of its employees spent about twenty hours a year detecting and deleting spam. Considering the average wage in Germany amounted to about €20 an hour, spam was costing the university some €400 per employee. Across eight thousand employees it added up to €3.2 million.

The cities of the Roman Empire depended on the countryside for food. During the Empire, the most important farm products were grapes and olives — used to make wine and olive oil — and cereals, such as wheat and barley.

① Farm animals provided townspeople with meat, milk, and cheese. ② Crops, such as fruit and vegetables, were usually sold to local towns, but olive oil, wine, and grain were exported in large quantities to cities all over the Empire. ③ Many townspeople saw life in the countryside as a peaceful alternative to living in a crowded city. ④ As Rome grew, farms in Italy could no longer provide enough grain to feed everyone. ⑤ At the height of the Empire, two-thirds of Rome's grain was imported from Egypt.

These days, people focus too much on winning in sports. They practice sports with the intention of winning, not with the intention of having fun. Many people argue that, when you concentrate only on winning, you try harder; but I don't think this is true. You cannot always win and losing is not the worst thing in the world.

Cathy: I think there is too much emphasis on winning in youth sports. Winning is not the whole picture of what sports are about.

Lola: Clearly, winners get more recognition and more fans. Isn't it natural for us to think only about winning when we work so hard for it?

Ethan: You win, or you lose. There is no in-between. You must always win.

Philip: I always cheer for my sister, saying, "Relax and just do your best. Even if you lose, remember you're still my hero."

In 1855, U.S. Secretary of War Jefferson Davis believed camels might prove more useful than horses in the severe, desert-like conditions in much of the western United States. A total of seventy-eight camels were brought from the Middle East to Texas.

(A) However, camels also came with disadvantages. Their strong smell drove horses crazy, while their spitting and biting made army drivers absolutely hate them.

(B) They quickly proved their worth. The camels could carry more than a thousand pounds on their backs, go days or weeks without water, and eat desert vegetation that other animals would not touch.

(C) Nonetheless, in 1858 a new Secretary of War, John Floyd, was so enthusiastic about the use of camels that he asked Congress to import a thousand camels for military use. But Congress did not accept the call for camels.

The robber was deeply moved. 'What a good boy! Bad luck will surely come to me if I rob so dutiful a son,' he thought to himself. He went on his way, leaving all the things he had laid out.
- (C) But the young man said nothing. The robber took his new shoes, but the young man still kept his lips tightly closed. Money often appears as a key need for people. People with money are more likely to be happy than people who have very little money, but provided you have about the average amount of money compared to people around you, you are likely to be as happy as anyone who has millions or billions. The key issue is who you compare yourself with, and whether you genuinely believe you are making the most of yourself. So, if you compare yourself only with millionaires, you will probably not be happy. But if you compare yourself with people around you, you will find that your income is about the same as theirs. If you enjoy the work you are doing, then you are far more likely to be happy than if you are trying desperately to get a job which pays more money.

To be happy, do not (1) _____ yourself with people who earn much more than you do. Try to (2) _____ the work you are doing.
